

The most prevalent question that is asked of the 'religious organization' today, whether it be a church or charity is, "What happened to make you look so much like the secular?" This leads to a litany of other questions such as:

- What is the biblical definition of the church and how should that look in our modern-day culture?
- Why have countless authors written warning after warning about the sad state of the American Christian, yet the church continues to stray and decay?
- Why are there so many denominations that refuse to cooperate in any way with one another and why does each claim they are "the only one true way" even though they all have the same standard pamphlet?
- Why does the church in America share more with an entertainment venue than looking like the place of healing and respite it was meant to be?
- Why do the goals of the American church more closely align with the goals of large criminal organizations than with the bible?
- Why can the church claim tax exempt status when some mega-churches generate millions of dollars of income each year?
- Why does the church provide its pastors with security teams that are often comprised of the local police/sheriff's office?
- Why do Christian organizations offer less mercy, less acceptance, and less friendship to the common man?
- Why are comfort, relationships, and relaxation for people, including most church members, found in secular places such as bars and sporting arenas?
- Why is there an almost venomous aversion to the church from people who have experienced it growing up?
- Why the societal phenomenon of the 'pastor's kid' and why is this stereotype always negative?

All these questions lead to a three-tier breakdown of: What should the church look like, what does the church look like, and why there is such a massive discrepancy between the two ends.
